Sir Thomas Browne and Orlando

By way of information for Roger Fry fans, Penthia Reid Broughton sent VVM her lively unpublished article on Fry's connection with a Cambridge literary magazine, Granta. She has rediscovered an essay he wrote in 1889 on the subject of becoming an artist in "today's world." He ends by describing (tongue-in-cheek) the ideal art school which he plans to start, to be "called on the principle of Hegelian dialect, the "Impressionist-Prel-Raphaelite School," and assures his readers blithely that though it had not done much yet, "time will show." Penthia kindly says that she could send a photostat of this early essay to any interested readers. Her address: Dept. of English, Louisiana State University, Baton Rouge, LA 70803.

Virginia Woolf's American Publisher

Nearly all the works of Virginia Woolf were originally published in the United States by Harcourt, Brace, New York, and they still retain the rights for those of both Leonard and Virginia that are under copyright in this country.

Harcourt, Brace was a small publisher founded by Alfred Harcourt and Donald Brice, salesmen for Holt & Co., a well-known trade and textbook publisher. Like many book salesmen, they dreamed of some day owning their own company and in 1920 succeeded in finding the capital to do so. The original name was Harcourt, Brace and Howe, but Howe soon dropped out. They were very lucky be-
