Ceremonies 1660-1837

The office of the ceremonies was responsible for the reception of foreign dignitaries. According to The Present State of the British Court,

This Office was instituted by K. James I. for the more solemn and honourable reception of Ambassadors and Strangers of Quality, whom he introduces into the Presence. The Badge of Office is a Gold Chain and Medal, having on one side an Emblem of Peace, with K. James's Motto, and on the reverse the Emblem of War, with Dieu & Mondroit [sic]. He is always suppos'd to be a Person of good Address, and Master of Languages. He is constantly attending at Court, and has under him an Assistant, Master, or Deputy, who holds his Place during the King's Pleasure. There is also a third Officer call'd Marshall of the Ceremonies, whose Business is to [re]cieve and distribute the Master's Orders, or the Deputy's, for the Service; but without their Order can do nothing.¹

The offices of master, assistant master and marshal of the ceremonies were in the gift of the Crown, appointments being embodied in letters patent under the great seal. At the Restoration in 1660 Sir Balthazar Gerbier had a grant of the office of master while Sir Charles Cotterell had a grant of that of assistant master together with a reversionary interest in the mastership itself. Gerbier was unable to secure the office and was formally suspended in December 1660. Cotterell was admitted in June 1660 and received a grant by letters patent in the following February.²

Cotterell continued to receive the remuneration attached to the office of assistant master until 1668 when this was revived as a distinct office. Promotion from assistant to master was usual and in three instances assistants received reversionary grants of the principal office.³ The office of assistant master was held concurrently with that of marshal of the ceremonies 1710-40, 1745-58 and invariably from 1761.

The master received the aforementioned chain and medal, worth £60, and a salary of £200 to which an allowance of £100 was added in 1686. The assistant was paid 6s 8d a day. The marshal received £100.⁴

Revels 1660-1782

The office of the revels anciently had the task of organizing plays, masques, balls and pageants at court. The master also had the licensing of plays, puppet-shows, and other diversions. The master was appointed by lord chamberlain's warrant.¹ Such appointments were also embodied in letters patent under the great seal and Sir Henry Herbert, Thomas Killigrew and Charles Killigrew received grants in reversion in this manner.² The office was held on a life tenure until 1725 and during pleasure thereafter. The salary was £10; however, this was augmented considerably by licensing fees.³

A comptroller of the revels was established in 1715.

The yeoman and groom of the revels were appointed by lord chamberlain's warrant.⁴ The yeoman's salary was £46 11s 8d, the groom's £10.⁵ Deputy masters and yeomen occasionally served. The groom's position was probably abolished at the accession of James II. The remaining offices were abolished in 1782.⁶

Removing Wardrobe 1660-1782

The removing wardrobe looked after those furnishings which traveled from palace to palace. 'It also attends upon Ambassadors, upon Christnings, Masques, Plays, &c. To furnish such things as are wanting, and to take Account of their re-delivery.' Its establishment consisted of a yeoman with a salary of £230, two grooms with salaries of £130 and three pages with salaries of £100, all appointed by lord chamberlain's warrant. Officers of the removing wardrobe also received riding wages and fees of honour, worth about £12 apiece under Queen Anne.¹ An assistant and two servants to the removing wardrobe were established in 1756 at £60, £40 and £30, respectively, per annum. The removing wardrobe was abolished in 1782.²

The duty of the coffer bearers was to load baggage when the court went on progress or moved between palaces. They were two in number and were appointed by lord chamberlain's warrant.¹ They received salaries of £27 7s 6d.² The offices were abolished in 1782.³

House and Wardrobe Keepers 1660-1837

The house and wardrobe keepers were responsible for looking after the sovereign's houses and the furniture within them, respectively. They were under the authority of the lord chamberlain, who appointed them. Some of these officers held by patent for life.¹

The under housekeeper and wardrobe keeper at Audley End was paid £150 in salary, £120 for keeping the garden and £100 for house cleaning under Charles II. This was reduced to £250 under William III. The position was abolished in 1702.²

The housekeeper at Brighton, first established as part of the main household in 1812, made £112 plus £64 10s in board wages and an allowance of £455 for ten housemaids.³

The housekeeper at Carlton House, also first established as part of the main household in 1812, made £110 in 1823. She was also given an allowance of £455 for ten housemaids. The position was abolished by the Establishment of 1831.⁴

The keeper of the standing wardrobe and privy lodgings at Greenwich received 8 [?shillings] per diem under Charles II. This was commuted to £225 per annum by the reign of William III.⁵

At Hampton Court, the housekeeper's position was linked to the rangership of Bushy Park. This position seems to have been unpaid and was usually held by letters patent by a peer. The under housekeeper at Hampton Court made £23 6s 8d per annum under Charles II, £250 under William III, £320 by 1720. In 1782 the under housekeeper's position was merged with that of the housekeeper at £320 per annum. This fell to £250 under George IV and William IV; however in 1825 the under housekeeper reported receiving an additional £393 4s in fees for showing the palace. The keeper of the standing wardrobe and privy lodgings made £51 11s 8d under Charles II, £200 by the reign of William III.⁶

At Kensington, a single house and wardrobe keeper (held jointly by successive married couples 1689-27) made £300 at the Exchequer and £127 15s from the cofferer per annum. Under William III, the de Briennes received an additional £36 10s for a servant. In 1782 the housekeeper's place was reduced from £486 18s to £300 per annum, which remained its remuneration to the end of the period. This officer also received £12 in lieu of wine. Under George III the wardrobe keeper made £100. The Housekeeper at Bayswater made £30 per annum in 1746.⁷

The housekeeper at Kew made £120 13s under George III. In 1823 a second housekeeper's position for Kew House was established at £112, augmented by an allowance of £136 10s for three housemaids. Finally, the keeper of the Cottage at Kew made £46 per annum.⁸

At Ludlow Castle, the keeper of the standing wardrobe received poundage on bills under Charles II. No payment is listed by the reign of William III. The housekeeper's position appears to have been honorary and unpaid. Both positions fail to appear on household establishments after 1702.⁹

Under Charles II Newmarket House was kept by an under housekeeper whose remuneration has not been determined. In 1689 a housekeeper and wardrobe keeper was established at £200 per annum. This figure rose to £210 by 1782, but was reduced in that year to £120. The position was abolished by 1823.¹⁰

The housekeeper at the Queen's House (later Buckingham House) made £450 under George III and George IV.¹¹

In 1831 a housekeeper of the Queen's Lodge at Bushy Park was established at £112.¹²

The housekeeper at Richmond made £78 per annum under William III.¹³

At St. James's, the housekeeper's and under housekeeper's positions were combined until the middle of Anne's reign at a salary of £80 per annum and 8d per diem. Thereafter the positions were split: the housekeeper's place became a sinecure at £92 3s 4d and the under housekeeper, who presumably performed the duty, received £60. In 1717 George I abolished the housekeeper's position by purchasing it from Robert Harley, Earl of Oxford for £7,500. By 1782 the under housekeeper's total emoluments had risen to £650 4s 6d, but this was reduced to £300 in that year. The keeper of the standing wardrobe received £110. This position was abolished as part of Economical Reform in 1782. On the Establishment of 1823 the housekeeper to the State Apartments at St. James's rose to £300 per annum. She also received £260 for lodging and £6 6s in lieu of wine. A deputy housekeeper was established at £112 in 1824. The 1831 establishment at St. James's was comprised of the housekeeper of the State Apartments at the above salary; a housekeeper of Old St. James's Palace and one of New St. James's Palace (i.e., Buckingham Palace) at £112 apiece.¹⁴

At Somerset House, a housekeeper's position was not established until 1714, when it received £200; that of the under housekeeper until 1707, when it received £100. The wardrobe keeper's position was established at £120 per annum under Charles II. By the reign of George III this had fallen to £100. The post of housekeeper was abolished as part of Economical Reform in 1782.¹⁵

The keeper of the wardrobe at the Tower of London made £36 per annum under Charles II. This position was apparently eliminated from the household rolls by 1685. The keeper of the lions was generally held by patent.¹⁶

The housekeeper at Westminster had custody not of the whole of the Palace of Westminster but only that part of it which came to be associated with the House of Lords, whence the holder derived his or her popular title. As such the housekeeper received 6s 8d per diem (£9 2s 6d per annum) payable at the Exchequer and an allowance of 5s 8d per diem (or £121 13s 4d per annum) payable by the treasury of the Chamber. The history of this position is complicated. Although the housekeeper was, as a rule, admitted to office pursuant to a lord chamberlain's warrant, the right of appointment appears to have been vested effectively in the Crown. In 1660 the office was held by John Wynyard by virtue of a grant for life made in 1635. In 1673 he obtained a reversionary grant in favour of his wife Margaret and their daughter, Grace. Both were dead by 1676 when he obtained a further reversionary grant in favour of his two daughters Elizabeth and Anne successively. On John's death in 1690 Anne, the sole survivor, succeeded to the office. Shortly before her death in 1705 she surrendered her life interest and was granted instead a lease of the office for thirty-one years in favour of herself and her husband, John Incedon, and their heirs and assigns. In 1718 Incedon executed a deed assigning the unexpired portion of his lease to his daughter Jane Grace and his son Charles and their heirs successively. On Incedon's death in 1720 the office passed accordingly to Jane Grace who subsequently married Nathaniel Blackerby. On Jane Grace's death without issue in 1726 the office was vested in her brother who was, however, immediately bought out by Blackerby. In the following year Blackerby surrendered the remainder of the lease and obtained a new grant of the office for thirty-one years. On his death in 1742 it passed in accordance with the terms of his will to his daughter, Anne. In 1756 Anne surrendered her interest and received in exchange yet another lease of thirty-one years in favour of herself and her younger sister Elizabeth and their assigns. Elizabeth Blackerby predeceased her sister in 1780. Thereafter, a certain amount of confusion ensued. The lord chamberlain seems to have assumed that the office was vacant since the annual allowance of £121 13s 4d was transferred to Margaret Tolpay who received a warrant of appointment in 1782. However, Anne Blackerby continued to receive the salary of 6s 8d at the Exchequer until the expiry of the lease in 1787. Both salary and allowance were then transferred to Margaret Quarme who received a grant of the office by letters patent in 1789. In 1823 the position was slated for abolition at the next vacancy. The keeper of the armoury at Westminster made £13 6s 8d plus of £26 13s 4d in 1689.¹⁷

At the beginning of the period, Whitehall had the most extensive establishment, as befitted its status as the largest and principal residence of the Sovereign. First, the housekeeper made ,138 per annum under Charles II; this was raised to £650 under William III. He was supported by an under housekeeper at £13 per annum in wages, 4s per diem in board wages. This was raised to 5s per diem under William III. At the beginning of the period there were two keepers of the galleries and privy lodgings at £50 in wages, £100 in board wages and £6 18s 4d in livery. The figure for board wages fell to £54 15 s under William III. A theatre keeper made £30 per annum under William III. Finally the keeper of the standing wardrobe made £32 5s in wages, £127 15s in board wages (i.e., 7s per diem) under Charles II. This became £200 under William III, then £160 under George II. The housekeeper's and under housekeeper's positions continued to be filled into the reign of George III, long after the destruction of Whitehall Palace in 1698, thereby becoming among the most notorious sinecures at the Hanoverian court. In 1755 a housekeeper of the cockpit at Whitehall was established at £60 per annum. In 1782, this last office was merged with that of the housekeeper.¹⁸

The housekeeper at Windsor made 8d per diem. By the reign of William III this became £320 per annum. His remuneration rose to £408 by 1782, but was reduced to £300 in that year and continued at this rate in subsequent reigns. Towards the end of the period there emerged a housekeeper of the state apartments at Windsor, which is not always distinguished in the admissions documents from the older position. The keeper of the standing wardrobe initially made £13 13s in wages. Under William III this became £160 per annum. This post was abolished as part of Economical Reform in 1782. In 1823 the housekeepers of the Cottage, Cumberland Lodge and the Upper Lodge and Castle at Windsor made £112 apiece, plus allowances of £182 for four housemaids, £91 for two and £455 for ten housemaids, respectively.¹⁹

The housekeeper at York seems to have been unpaid on the household establishments. His position was apparently abolished on the Establishment of 1685.

From 1806 all under housekeepers are listed as housekeepers.²⁰

Independent Sub-departments

Robes 1660-1837

The duty of the office of the robes was to 'order all his majesty's Robes; as those of his Coronation, of St. George's Feast, and parliament also, of all his majesty's wearing Apparel, of his Collar of SS's, George and Garter, beset with Diamonds and Pearls.' The office accounted separately to the Treasury.¹

At the beginning of the period the salaried officers of the robes consisted of a master, a clerk of the robes and wardrobes, a yeoman, three grooms, a page, a brusher, and a taylor in addition to about twenty tradesmen paid via bills for goods and services. The office of master, or gentleman and master, was in the gift of the Crown. The master was admitted in pursuance of a warrant issued for that purpose. In 1662 this warrant was directed to the groom of the stole; subsequent warrants were directed to the lord chamberlain until 1830 when Seymour was appointed directly by royal warrant.² Until 1809, except for those made during the reign of Anne, appointments were embodied in letters patent under the great seal which granted the office for life until 1679 and during pleasure thereafter. The salary was originally £500. During the reign of Anne it was increased to £600. In 1716 it was £1,240. From 1727 it was fixed at £800.³

The yeoman was appointed by lord chamberlain's warrant. Under George I his salary was £380; by 1761 it had fallen to £255. Early in the period he was also entitled to fees of honour worth about £15 under George I. The office was abolished in 1782.⁴ The grooms were appointed in the same manner. They numbered three except during the reigns of James II and Anne when they were reduced to one. Three served from 1715 to 1783-4 when they were again reduced to one. In 1761 the first and second grooms received £80 and the third £60 a year. Under William III the page of the robes made £20. This rose to £58 by 1782. Early in the period, the yeoman, grooms and page all received riding wages and livery worth £40 per annum apiece. The yeoman and grooms were also entitled to fees of honour, which averaged about £16 a year under Queen Anne.⁵ The brusher of the robes made £40 plus livery money of £20 per annum. By 1782 his total emoluments had risen to £80 per annum. Early in the period, the tailor of the robes was the only paid tradesman: he made £83 5s in livery money under William III. This payment appears to have been abolished by 1714. However, by 1763 the furrier was paid £20 per annum. By 1782 the waiters made £90 and £50 respectively.⁶

All subordinate trades positions were appointed by the master, who requested the lord chamberlain to order that the gentleman usher, daily waiter swear them in. At the accession of Queen Anne her mistress of the robes, Sarah, Countess of Marlborough, refused to designate any tradesmen in ordinary in an attempt to leave the Crown free to contract on an individual basis with the least expensive supplier.⁷

Jewel Office 1660-1782

The jewel office fashioned, kept and weighed the King's plate and provided gifts of plate to foreign dignitaries. The master of the jewel office was appointed by royal warrant.¹ As a general rule appointments were embodied in letters patent under the great seal but this course was not followed during the reign of Anne. Talbot was appointed for life.² Lawley was appointed for the life of Talbot and during pleasure thereafter. All remaining grants were during pleasure. The master enjoyed a patent fee of £50 transferred in 1685 from the Exchequer to the treasurer of the chamber. In 1686 he was granted a salary of £400 from the cofferer in lieu of a number of earlier allowances. He was also entitled to lodgings or £80 in lieu thereof. In 1730 he was granted £700 a year at the Exchequer making a total of £1,150.³

The clerk, yeomen and groom of the office were appointed by lord chamberlain's warrant, the clerk's appointment being embodied in letters patent under the great seal. The offices of clerk and groom were held singly. Two yeomen were appointed except during the years 1702-41 when only one served. The salary of the clerk was £13 6s 8d, of the yeomen £106 15s and of the groom £105 8s 4d. In addition, the yeoman made £182 in office fees by 1782. All were entitled to riding wages⁴

The goldsmith supplied plate to the jewel office and was paid directly out of the Exchequer. The jeweler and silversmith performed work for the office as well. Prior to 1782, the offices of goldsmith and jeweler were in the gift of the master of the jewel office, who wrote to the lord chamberlain to order the gentlemen ushers, quarter waiters to swear them in. For most of Charles II's reign there were three goldsmiths at £10 per annum, two jewelers at £100 per annum, several subordinate jewelers at £10 apiece and a working jeweler (?with no fixed salary) attached to the jewel office. Subsequently one goldsmith, one jeweler and (under William III) a silversmith served with no fixed salary until 1782.⁵

After the abolition of the jewel office in 1782,⁶ the goldsmiths, jewelers and silversmiths were appointed by lord chamberlain's warrant to the gentlemen usher's daily waiters. These offices were often combined and the number of their holders varied considerably.

2. Talbot's predecessor, Sir Henry Mildmay, did not surrender his patent until 1 July 1661. Although sworn on 21 June 1660, Talbot did not receive his until 27 Oct. 1661 (C 66/2978).

The principal officer of the great wardrobe was the master. He was appointed by the Crown by letters patent under the great seal. The grants in 1660 and 1671 in favour of Sir Edward Montagu and Ralph Montagu were for life. Despite this, the latter was displaced on the accession of James II in 1685 by Viscount Preston who was appointed during pleasure. Montagu returned to office in 1689 by virtue of his grant of 1671. His son the second Duke of Montagu received a life grant in reversion in 1705 which did not expire until his death in 1749. Thereafter all grants were during pleasure. In 1674 the Master was granted a fixed salary of £2,000 in lieu of poundage, plus a livery payment of £106 3s 4d. The former was reduced to £800 in 1749, increased again to £2,000 in 1760 and finally fixed at £1,400 in 1775. In fact, the master continued to receive poundage on some goods, yielding at least £300 and 'probably much more'.²

The office of deputy was in the gift of the master. His salary, fixed at £200 in 1674, was reduced to £150 in 1761. The assistant to the deputy master was established by 1765 and made £50 per annum.³

The office of clerk of the great wardrobe was appointed by the Crown by letters patent under the great seal. Grants were for life except that of 1706 which was during pleasure. The salary was fixed at £300 in lieu of fees in 1674. In addition, he received livery worth £34 and continued to take poundage on some goods.⁴

The clerk of the robes and wardrobes, appointed by lord chamberlain's warrant, was under the direction of the great wardrobe. He received a salary of £160. Under Charles II Richard Colinge and his son Richard held the reversion to the office by letters patent. The clerk assistant of the robes and wardrobes made £12 per annum, livery of £40 and £30 for passing accounts.⁵

The offices of comptroller and surveyor of the great wardrobe were instituted in 1668 with salaries of £300 each. Appointments were made by the Crown by letters patent under the great seal. Both offices lapsed in 1685. The office of comptroller was revived in 1729. Appointments thereafter were made by royal warrant under the sign manual. The salary, originally £500, had been reduced to £300 by 1749. There were two clerks to the surveyor. By 1703, an under clerk had been established; a second was added by 1724. By 1782 these positions were sinecures at £17 10s apiece.⁶

In addition to the principal officers of the great wardrobe, there were about 60 tradesmen, all in the gift of the master. Only a few of the tradesmen received regular remuneration from household paymasters. Of these the sergeant skinner made £54 3s 4d by 1782; the yeoman arras worker made 2s per diem; the yeoman tailor and portitor, £24 10s and £26 in livery money. The yeoman arras worker and tailor made £91 each by 1782, when they were described as sinecures. The running porter made £30 per annum (as running porter and messenger, £105 by 1782); the porter £20. The housemaid received £20; by 1782 the post was a sinecure. In addition, the embroiderer received £34 1s, the joiner £8 and the coffer maker £8 10s in livery money.⁷

The great wardrobe was abolished in 1782.⁸ A wardrobes sub-department continued to exist under the lord chamberlain until the early nineteenth century, when it was folded into the office of the robes. Under the new establishment of 1782 the resident clerk of the great wardrobe made £300 per annum in salary, livery, fees and other perquisites. He was assisted by a second clerk until about 1809 and an assistant clerk until 1794 when Henry Browell became resident clerk. In 1836 the messenger to the wardrobe office made £65.⁹

The master's poundage, computed at the rate of 12 1/2%, had yielded about £2,500 per annum prior to its abolition in 1674: Bucholz, p. 314 n. 57. According to Beattie, p. 191, the master's fees probably continued to yield about £1,000 per annum.
